

Reference and Linguistic Intuitions

Eric McCready
Aoyama Gakuin University

Recent experiments indicate that cultural background may influence the mechanisms individuals use to determine the reference of proper names. If this result is right, it has serious implications not only for philosophy but also for the practice of theoretical linguistics. In this talk I examine these implications and possible alternate explanations, as well as considering the role of intuitions in linguistics more generally.